Why is Tunisia a good partner for China?

Tunisia's location at the center of the North African coast, with access to European and African markets and close to vital shipping routes, makes it a valuable partner for China. This fact spurred Beijing to include Tunisia in its Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), for which the two governments signed a memorandum of understanding in 2018.

Why is China unable to start a large-scale project in Tunisia?

Tunisia's structural roadblocks, public skepticism, and ongoing domestic crises have combined to limit its relationship with China, leaving Beijing unable to jumpstart its typical large-scale projects and investments.

How does China approach a BRI partnership with Tunisia?

As with other BRI countries, China claims to approach the partnership with two main principles in mind: noninterference in Tunisia's internal affairs, and unfettered opportunism. Both of these principles are meant to contrast with the Western approach by offering more straightforward, quick decisionmaking as well as low-cost labor and financing.

Should China be overestimated in Tunisia?

Tunisia is a case in point. On one hand, it illustrates why China's real influence in the region should not be overestimated. On the other hand, Beijing's overall strategy highlights the risks of letting Tunisia's democratic and economic situation deteriorate further.
