Who is responsible for a downed power line?

The company's responsibility also extends to the service drop, the line connecting the main utility pole to your house. A downed power line on private property remains the utility company's responsibility to repair. These lines can carry thousands of volts and remain energized even when on the ground, creating a lethal risk.

Who is responsible for electricity shut off laws?

Beyond the federal safety net, each state is responsible for passing and upholding electricity shut off laws. During emergencies, such as the recent pandemic, many areas paused utility shut offs altogether, offering a lifeline to those hit hardest.

Who is responsible for a utility line drop?

While the utility handles the main lines, the property owner is usually responsible for the service drop running from the pole to the house. Homeowners must ensure that trees on their property are kept clear of this specific line.

Why does my power cut in and out?

If your power cuts in and out, it might indicate loose connections, damaged circuit breakers, or an overloaded circuit. As an example, loose connections at the electricity meter will cause intermittent and /or total power outage. Keep track of when the power goes off, it may occur when using higher powered appliances for instance.
